Paul Brahm's:

Brahm's work features loose brushwork often depicting the coast of Maine and the figures that inhabit it. In his own words " I aspire to be like the bee who tells his co-workers where the flowers are or a filmmaker who illuminates the tension in a scene. I want my work to move, to have atmosphere, and to embody a searching, questioning state of being, but this requires meditation as much as agitation, and I straddle this polarity often, leaving a visual record of this struggle."

Paul Bonneau:

Often referred to as a “colorist”, Paul’s work is fresh and directly painted. His simple, concrete shapes and strong contrasts of light and shadow provides the platform for his intensification of local color. His goal: “to capitalize on the joy and to hold the memory of a place that has made an impression - somewhere between reality and illusion.”

Russ Cox:

Cox's oil paintings evoke the sensory feeling associated with place, nature and experience. Works evolve from a process of applying layer upon layer with multiple glazes to create movement, translucency and depth. These works are deeply meditative, becoming more complex as they unfold.

Anne Ireland:

My paintings are the result of observation informed by imagination—a place where the iconic is seen in the emotional context of mystery and surprise. There is a powerful energy when sky meets ground. To intensify that connection I strive to create a psychologically-nuanced atmosphere of unexpected color, giving it depth and consequence.
